PREFACE

It has been difficult, indeed, to determine what tribute would be the most fitting in this year which marks the Three Hundredth Anniversary of the Founding of the Town of Greenwich. Exhaustive histories have been written covering nearly every phase of the transition of Greenwich from a small farming community, looking to the soil as the ultimate source of subsistence, to a thriving residential suburb of the world's largest metropolis. These histories have been a most valuable contribution to the town and will prove more and more valuable.

The editors of The Greenwich Press, in searching for the suitable medium to commemorate the Tercentenary Anniversary, perceived what they felt to be a pressing need in the town records. Working under the assumption that Greenwich has a proportionately greater percentage of nationally prominent residents than any other community in the country, they discovered that there existed no single volume which presented a comprehensive picture of those citizens. It has been our endeavor to coordinate and expand locally a work which has been carried on in a decentralized manner by various and sundry national, state and district "Who's Who" volumes in the past. That has been the central purpose behind "GREENWICH 1940."

That no important phase of community life should be omitted, views of many of the beautiful estates and public buildings which have contributed greatly to the nation-wide fame of Greenwich are herein reproduced. It has seemed appropriate to include also a history of the town to trace briefly the important steps in the development of Greenwich in 1940.

In the preparation of this commemorative volume, the editors are deeply indebted to the cooperation of those persons whose biographical sketches appear on the following pages. Without their assistance, this venture could not have been attempted. Every effort has been made to justify their confidence.

There have been many admirable volumes dipping deeply into the history and legend of Greenwich, and it is from these sources that much of the material for the historical section of "GREENWICH IN 1940" has been drawn. Daniel Merritt Mead's "A History of the Town of Greenwich," Spencer Mead's "Ye Historie of Ye Town of Greenwich," Frederick A. Hubbard's "Other Days in Greenwich," and "Greenwich Old and New" by Lydia Holland and Margaret Leaf have proved invaluable to the author.

The editors are further indebted for the photographs of the Greenwich of today to Dayton Snyder of Stamford; and to Samuel Gottsehe of Jamaica, New York; Mattie Edwards Hewett of New York City, and Ruth H. Mallory of Danbury, Connecticut.

The Greenwich Press considers itself extremely fortunate in having been able to secure the expert assistance of Mr. Edmund B. Thompson of the Hawthorne House, Windham, Connecticut, in the designing, lay-out and other technical problems which have arisen in connection with the publication of "GREENWICH IN 1940."

HISTORY OF GREENWICH

GREENWICH in 1940 is a modern residential suburb of the world's largest metropolis; within its fifty square miles are the homes of more than thirty-five thousand persons; crowded within its borders are hundreds of beautiful estates and shaded avenues; through its vast outlying districts runs a four-lane ribbon of concrete which represents the latest in engineering achievement. Its citizens are known wherever intelligent people congregate.

But Greenwich was not always so. Before a day in mid-July three hundred years ago it was a haven for warring Indians, for fur-trappers and traders; the flags of three nations have flown from its flag-staffs; three major wars have claimed the lives of its citizens. It is back upon such a crowded history as this that Greenwich looks as it celebrates its Three Hundredth Anniversary.

It was a tiny group of English and Dutch pioneers who steered their light craft into Greenwich waters in July of 1640 in the search of fertile land to be claimed for the New Haven Colony. Daniel Patrick and Robert Feaks, bold adventurers who led the party, concluded a treaty with the Indian sachems two days later, on the 18th of July, for the land which is now known as Old Greenwich. For their part in the bargain, the Indians received twenty-five English coats.

The point of land on which the pioneers first touched was at that time called Monakewego by the Indian tribes that made their homes in the vicinity. By the terms of the treaty, however, it became "ye peticaler perchace of Elizabeth Feaks, ye sd Robt Feaks his wife" and was later called Elizabeth Neck. Modern day residents of Greenwich know it as Tod's Point. It was there that Robert Feaks raised his first crude home, and in all probability Daniel Patrick and his Dutch-born wife settled close by.

The names of Jeffrey Ferris, Robert Heusted, Andrew Messenger, John Winkelman, Angell Heusted, Richard Williams, Everardus Bogardus and Cornelius Labden figured prominently in the early history of the town. We do not know with any degree of confidence the exact size of that first settlement, nor can we be sure of the number of women who made the trip.

Scarcely had the pioneers begun to break the ground for their new homes before the savagery of the Indian raids forced upon them a decision which was of vital importance to the security of the town. Though settled officially by the English of the New Haven Colony, Greenwich lay within what the Dutch considered their sphere of influence. The cross-current of bitter argument which arose between the Dutch in New Amsterdam and the English of the New Haven Colony emphasized to the colonists the importance of aligning themselves with one or the other of the two nations. In October, 1640, a boundary dispute arose which was settled only after much dissension and ill-feeling had been created. Early the following month the Dutch reiterated their claim against the British, almost to the verge of war. Patrick, who was skeptical of the benefits to be gained from the New Haven Colony, decided that better protection from the Indians could be had from New Amsterdam. And so, on April 9, 1641, he and Elizabeth Feaks, acting for, and with the full consent of, her bedridden husband, signed the treaty which placed the settlement under Dutch jurisdiction. Greenwich officially became a Dutch manor and Patrick and Feaks became patroons by the signing of the agreement.

Removed from English domination, Greenwich gradually assumed a more cosmopolitan and liberalistic attitude than did its neighbors. Allied with the more liberal Dutch, it grew away from typical New England Puritanism. Although Patrick dwelled in the Greenwich he had helped build but three short years before his tragic and untimely death, his influence was felt long after his presence was missing.

Although July 18, 1640, is given as the official date of the founding of Greenwich, trappers and fur traders had carried on their dealings with the Indians in this locality for many years before that. Indeed, there is strong evidence that a few settlers had made their homes here before the arrival of Patrick and Feaks. As an addition to the Indian Treaty of 1640 is the statement that "Keoffram hath sould all his Right in ye above sd necks unto Jeffre Ferris." The signature of the Indian chieftain pictures a blockhouse which is believed to have been the home of Ferris. If it may be assumed that Ferris had settled here prior to 1640, the name Greenwich may be attributed to him. Greenwich, England, was a favorite visiting place of Queen Elizabeth, in whose court a Richard Ferris is known to have served about 1590. Jeffrey Ferris, his son or nephew, chose as the name of the new settlement that of the English town which long had enjoyed royal favor.

Although these first settlers had thrown in their lot with the Dutch hoping to secure safety from the Indians, the hostility of the Indian raids increased. Smarting under the ruthless treatment of Governor William Keift of New Amsterdam, the savages sought revenge for the many atrocities which had been committed against them. The Indian village of Petuquapaen, situated midway between Stamford and the New York line on the present Post Road, at the plains which were later named Stricklands, served as a base from which the young braves of the neighboring tribes sought a personal glory by the bravado of their attacks on the white men.

The popular legend of Laddin's Rock belongs to this period. As the common version of the story goes, Cornelius Labden, his wife and sixteen-year-old daughter were attacked in their home by a band of Indians. Besieged on all sides, the family realized that their only chance of safety lay in obtaining help from the village, so Labden leapt on his horse and dashed off, hotly pursued by three Indians. But even before he was out of sight of his house, he saw the two women dragged outside and scalped. Dazed, grief-stricken, Labden plunged onward, but he could not escape the fleet braves. Preferring quick death to torture, he plunged over the brink of the cliff which is known today as Laddin's Rock. As the courageous pioneer tumbled over the ledge he cried out "Come on, ye foul fiends, I go to join your victims."

This tragic legend, however, falls short of credibility, for, as Daniel Merritt Mead pointed out many years later, Labden's three savage pursuers were the only survivors of the incident and to assume that this tale was started by them is not easy to accept.

True or false, the Laddin Rock legend typifies the danger in which these first settlers lived.

5 One attack on Petuquapaen had failed a short time before, but in February, 1644, a company, led by Captain John Underhill, succeeded in wiping out forever the threat which beset Greenwich from the days of its settlement. One hundred and fifty volunteers landed in Stamford the first of February and set out against Petuquapaen after an intense snowstorm had forced a temporary halt. But an attack, even at such a time, did not find the Indians unprepared; the womenfolk had been moved back to safety and the braves were on the alert. For some time a furious battle raged on the hill outside the village, before the musket began to prove its supremacy over the bow. The redskins, forced to fall back before the rain of lead, withdrew into the village where the shots of the white men proved ineffective. Captain Underhill then decided to employ the tactics which his opponents had found successful in their plundering raids on undefended settlers. Burning branches, thrown into the midst of flimsy shelters, made a blazing inferno of Petuquapaen. Those Indians who were not slaughtered on the hills outside the village perished within its walls, but it is said that not a cry was heard from within the village. The jubilant white men piled the bodies high in a single mound and then marched victoriously back to Greenwich where a special Thanksgiving was declared by New Amsterdam.

The death of Daniel Patrick came as a great blow to the town. Always outspoken, the Captain dubbed a traitor the Dutch commander of the first unsuccessful attack on Petuquapaen. Patrick spat in the Dutchman's face, turned on his heel and walked away. The Dutch commander pulled his pistol and fired. Daniel Patrick fell, a piece of lead lodged in the back of his head. Robert Feaks, who had been ill for some time, lost his reason when he received the news of the death of his close friend, and in 1647 the deranged Feaks left for England, designating William Hallet as manager of his estate and protector of his family. The tongues of the gossips began to wag over the unconventional household, and it was not long before Elizabeth Feaks was forced to leave Greenwich, but before her official banishment in 1649, she sold parcels of her land to incoming settlers. The English citizens of Stamford were indignant over what they considered an illegal transfer of property, and a serious dispute arose between the two communities.

Greenwich appealed in desperation to Governor Stuyvesant in New Amsterdam, but the Dutch leader was unable to offer assistance. At this time the boundary between the Dutch and English colonies was set at the western bank of Greenwich bay. But the town of Greenwich was to remain under the Dutch government. A few years later, however, the English claimed the community and it became a part of the New Haven colony, under the jurisdiction of the town of Stamford.

But Greenwich chose to disobey the rules of its new protector. In an attempt to curb the lawless behavior of its neighbor, Stamford, in 1655, lodged a complaint with the General Court in New Haven, charging the residents of Greenwich with riotous living, stirring up the Indians with "firewater," fostering unlawful marriages, and otherwise lowering the standard of decency in the countryside.

The General Court dispatched a letter to Greenwich demanding that the town mend its ways, but this official communication met only with a spirited denial that New Haven had any right to make such a demand. The Court passed a resolution that unless Richard Crab and the others who had been most stubborn in their opposition appeared in open court by June 25, 1656, they would be arrested. Evidently Crab yielded for twelve citizens of Greenwich signed an agreement placing the town under the authority of the New Haven Colony.

For the next nine years the town had no government which it could call its own but was under the jurisdiction of Stamford. Gradually it lost much of its bad reputation, also much of its individuality. Men such as Jeffrey Ferris who had moved from Greenwich to Wethersfield because of their distaste for the Dutch, began to return.

The two colonies of Connecticut and New Haven were consolidated into one government, henceforth called Connecticut, in 1665. On May 11 of that year, the General Court at Hartford, acting on a petition from Greenwich, granted the town a patent, stating that "upon ye motion and desire of ye people of Greenwich, this court doth declare that Greenwich shall be a township entire of itself, provided they procure and maintain an orthodox minister, and in the meantime and until that be effected, they are to attend ye ministry at Stamford and to contribute proportionately with Stamford to ye maintenance of the ministry there." Thus Greenwich gained its independence.

The conflicting gifts of King Charles II of England caused much boundary trouble for the newly established community. In 1662, he had made to Connecticut the considerable grant of all the land to the west of the colony as far as the Pacific Ocean; but, two years later, he presented his brother, the Duke of Kent, with all the property which had belonged to the defeated Dutch colony of New Amsterdam, to run as far east as the Connecticut River. Thus Greenwich was at the same time a settlement within the boundaries of Connecticut and New York.

Peaceful settlement of the difficulty was effected by representatives of the two colonies, after an extended series of negotiations.

The border was at first established as a line twenty miles inland running parallel to the Hudson River. But a short time later the astute New England representatives persuaded Kent's envoys to accept a line which ran from Mamaroneck Creek north northwest to the Massachusetts border. The representatives from New York accepted the terms, not realizing that such a line actually moved the border back to a parallel ten miles from the Hudson River. But when the Duke understood the terms, a new arrangement had to be made. Since a line twenty miles from the Hudson would deprive Connecticut of many well-established towns like Greenwich, it was necessary to set a "zig-zag" boundary in the southern part of the state which was to be compensated for by an "equivalent traet" running from Ridgefield straight up to the Massachusetts border. The year 1683 is the date usually given for the final agreement, although a complete survey was not accomplished until 1731.

By the terms of the patent which had been granted to the Greenwich Congregational Society, the citizens of the community must "procure and maintain an orthodox minister." As early as 1660 measures had been taken by the town to tax its citizens for the support of a part-time minister, but no church had been formed nor was any minister ordained. In 1669 the Reverend Eliphant Jones took over his duties as the first part-time minister and received for his services a tract of land on the Mianus River.

The town still lacked a church building. Meetings were held in turn at the homes of the settlers and later in the school house which was constructed in 1667. In the year 1670, a William Grimes, who owned thirty acres near the Cove, in what is known today as Shorelands, died and willed his property to the town under the trusteeship of Joseph Mead, John Reynolds and Eliphant Jones. The will carried the stipulation that the land must be used for the general welfare of the community. There was at that time no need more pressing than for the construction of a church.

The pastorate of the Rev. Mr. Jones ended in 1672, and Greenwich was for a time again without a minister. In 1675 a parsonage was built and at a full town meeting in 1676 it was decided to invite a pastor to make his home in the community. The first invitation was ignored and it was not until 1678 that the Rev. Jeremiah Peck, one of the proprietors of the land on which Elizabethtown, N. J., was built, accepted and assumed charge of the Congregational Society of Greenwich. The new pastor was offered a salary of fifty pounds a year with firewood or sixty without; the Rev. Mr. Peck chose to take the sixty pounds and tend to the chopping of firewood himself.

In those early days of Greenwich, civil as well as ecclesiastical power in the community was vested in the church. Citizenship in the community was dependent upon good standing in the church and the ultimate selection of the Freeman of Greenwich was within the power of the minister. The freemen of the town voiced their opinions through the medium of the town meeting. Annually the meeting elected such officers as fenceviewers, cowkeepers, chimney-viewers and many others, each of which had his proper place in the society.

A quarter of a century produced great changes in the settlement. Farming thrived, the population increased and expansion to the westward, over the waters of the Mianus River, became inevitable.

The advisability of laying out a new township at Horseneck was brought before the town meeting for the first time on May 6, 1669 and a committee was appointed to survey the proposed addition. On the 6th of February, 1670, the committee reported that the land beyond the Mianus offered a fertile and desirable field for expansion. Another committee was appointed "to lay out a township upon the land lieing near Horseneck Brook to ye number of 30 lots, four acres to a home lot, if ye tract will bear it, and bee mindful for a peece of land for a common whear it is most meet." And so, the twenty-seven landowners in Greenwich became the "twenty-seven Proprietors of 1672."

Greenwich New Town was christened Horseneck after a point of land which had been cleared as a pasture for horses by the Indians. Although settlers began to spill across the Mianus River into Horseneck as early as 1670, the actual treaty with the Indians was not concluded until 1686 and was not recorded until 1701. So rapidly did Horseneck swell in both population and importance, that in 1696 the Rev. Joseph Morgan, then pastor of the church in Greenwich Old Town, started to preach every third Sunday in the new community. The following year he found it necessary to divide his Sundays between the two sections of the town, a decision which met with much disfavor in both settlements. Greenwich thought such a division of time too liberal, Horseneck thought it insufficient. Rather than cause an open split in the town, the Rev. Mr. Morgan deemed it advisable to resign his post.

But the resignation of the Rev. Mr. Morgan served only to fan the flames of dissension. The dispute reached such heights in October of 1703 that it was placed before the General Court in Hartford. By the judgment of that Court, it was "recommended to the inhabitants of said Greenwich that they would indeavor an amicable agreement amongst themselves." Apparently no such compromise was possible between the warring factions, for in 1705 the town was divided into two church societies with the official approval of the Colonial legislature. The Rev. Mr. Morgan was installed as pastor of the Second Congregational Society. The care of his grist mill in Stricklands, however, competed with his effectiveness as a pastor. In 1708 he decided to give up his position as minister and devote his full time to the task of supporting his family of twelve.

Gradually the Greenwich of the pioneer settlers was becoming a town. Even as early as the end of the seventeenth century, the condition of the highways often came under discussion in the local town meetings. The first through post rider from New York to Boston in 1673 made the trip by way of Greenwich in two weeks, and a round-trip time of one month was finally established between the two cities. By 1700 the post rider was able to travel over a continuous road from New York to Boston, although the condition of that route certainly must have been poor enough. When George Washington traversed what is now the Post Road, in 1790, he found it "hilly and immensely stoney and trying to wheels and carriages."

As the public thoroughfare came ever into greater use, many of those farmers whose property bordered it foresook the soil in favor of more commercial undertakings. The first street signs began to make their appearance toward the end of the seventeenth century. The first license to keep an "ordinary or a house of publige enertainment" was granted in December 23, 1696, to Ebenczer Mead. Many a stirring episode occurred within the walls of the Mead Tavern which he founded. It stood for nearly two hundred years at the head of Greenwich Avenue, on the site of the present Presbyterian Church, and had a long and colorful history.

Greenwich, in spite of its democratic town meeting, was a landed aristocracy, with its early settlers, such as the Mead, Ferris, Lockwood and Reynolds families, guarding with fierce tenacity the land which at that time was the yard stick of wealth. All immigrants to the community were eyed with suspicion as prospective usurpers of the inherited kingdoms of the established families.

Shipping became a leading industry of the town as the middle of the eighteenth century approached. As early as 1696 a weekly packet boat sailed from Mianus to New York; similar service was commenced from Cos Cob in 1710 and from Rocky Neck, which is now known as Steamboat Road, in 1725. Although the boats were fitted to carry passengers, their main purpose was the transportation of produce to the New York market. At first potatoes constituted the only shipments, and Greenwich had such an output that it could frequently control the price on the New York market. As time passed, however, other types of produce assumed importance. Gradually the town acquired a few citizens who devoted themselves to occupations other than farming, so that as 1750 drew near Greenwich developed into a progressive and well-balanced community.

Education rightly occupied an important place in the lives of the early residents of Greenwich. The first school house had been constructed in Greenwich Old Town in 1667, three years before the first church, and was used periodically as school, meeting house, and place of worship. Neither the location nor the master of the first school is known today. In 1667 it was "noted that the schoolmaster duse for teaching scoole must bee payd according to ye number of scoullards that went to scoole, a rate to be made in due proportion to make the sum up to what shall fall short of that which is given by any had (those having) noe children or child to send when ye pertikaler sumes was ingaged by them." The length of the school year was extended to six months in 1695 and the cost of education was shared only by those who sent students to the school.

The "public schools" of the eighteenth century little resembled the institutions which we know by that name today. Only rarely did the school house consist of more than one room. The classes were not graded and one teacher taught all pupils in the district, ranging in age from seven to twenty years. Poor weather and farm work constantly cut into the school session and made attendance irregular.

At the first sign of general discontent over English rule the citizens of Greenwich took steps to bolster their armed forces by calling up new recruits, who were trained by officers who had served in the French and Indian Wars. An investigation discovered that the ammunition supply of the town was low, so measures were adapted aimed at enlarging the store. When discontent gave way to open rebellion, the town was equipped. But Greenwich, despite its war preparations, was a town of conflicting loyalties, for there resided within its borders many ardent Tories, some of whom left when the war began and some of whom weathered the gale and became again leading citizens in the community after the storm had subsided.

The citizens of Greenwich were keenly aware of the threat to their freedom and met in special town meeting October 17, 1774, to take "into their serious consideration the alarming State of American Liberty." The meeting approved the harsh resolutions passed by the House of Representatives of the Colony in a previous session in Hartford and termed the acts of the British against Massachusetts "repugnant to the free principles of the English Constitution and in a High Degree Dangerous to the Civil and Religious Liberty of both British and American Protestants." Funds were immediately collected throughout the town for the aid of the Town of Boston which was "suffering under the Iron Hand of Despotic Power and ministerial influences."

When news of the Battle of Lexington reached Greenwich, one troop of local volunteers set out at once to aid Boston and another, led by Captain Abraham Mead, headed for New York to assist in the defense of that city. With the country engulfed in war, steps were taken to bolster home defense, and attempts were made to clear the town of the subversive Tory residents. A committee of safety was appointed and another committee was named at the same time "to inspect into and see that the families of those who enter into the Continental Army shall be supplied with the necessaries of life."

During the first two years of the struggle the citizens of Greenwich were only indirectly prepared for the dark days which were ushered in with the fall of New York. Once again the town lay on the border of neutral territory which stretched westward from the Byram River to the British stronghold in New York. When all attempts to recapture New York had failed, General Washington established a string of forts around it in an attempt to cut off its communication with the outside. One of the fortifications in the chain was at North Mianus and was called Fort Nonsense. It was from there that advance guards were sent out for the protection of Greenwich.

As Greenwich was subject to the marauding raids of the British, it saw a great deal of the portly figure of the much respected and beloved General Israel Putnam, when he made his rounds inspecting the guards and dispatching scouts. The tale of his thrilling escape from the Redcoats down what is known today as Put's Hill has become one of the most colorful legends in the history of the town.

On February 25, 1779, the General had dispatched a party to scout out the movements of the British in New York. Coming upon the enemy marching from Kingsbridge (now the Bronx), the scouts made their way back to "Old Put" as best they could, fighting where necessary. Once over the Byram River, they raised the bridge against the British and stalled them long enough to warn the General. Hastily he mustered what forces he could and drew them up in battle line to await the approaching British, under General Tryon. It was apparent, however, that the small band of Continental Irregulars could not hope to stand off the 1,500 British troops, so General Putnam ordered his forces to withdraw to a hill a short distance from Horseneck.

As his troops fell back before the impressive columns of Redcoats, General Putnam wheeled his horse onto the Post Road and headed toward Stamford for assistance. But as he sped along the road, he was recognized and pursued by several British cavalymen. With their faster horses, they were steadily overtaking the General when he reached Put's Hill. The road at that time curved off to the right and down the hill with a gradual slope, but the General realized that to follow the road would certainly mean his capture. He had to leave the highway and force his horse through the underbrush down the hill. Excellent horseman though they knew him to be, he left the British at the brow of the slope, dumbfounded, as he threaded his way down to the road. The enemy fired several shots at the fleeing figure, one of which passed through his hat. Legend tells us that the General turned around in his saddle, shook his fist toward his pursuers and shouted "God cuss ye, when I catch ye, I'll hang ye to the next tree!"

With General Putnam on his way to Stamford for reinforcements, Greenwich was once again in the hands of the English, who pillaged the town, driving off cattle, tearing down and burning homesteads, destroying food supplies and carrying away ammunition in carts stolen from the town. No raid in Greenwich history was more costly than this plundering attack by General Tryon. Rumor has it that the British general was calmly enjoying his meal in the Mead Tavern, when an American patriot crept close to him and fired a shot which shattered the mantle piece close to his ear. Without waiting, Tryon ordered his men to withdraw from the town. General Putnam, back from Stamford with 1,000 men, pursued the retreating British, many of whom were reeling from an excess of Greenwich cider. Many enemy prisoners were taken that day.

Much of the damage to the outlying districts was caused by British raiding parties, but a great deal was caused by the notorious bands of "Cowboys," who attacked British and Americans indiscriminately. Farms situated along the shore line were also liable to swift darting attacks from the British from their strongholds across the Sound. To combat British supremacy on the Sound, many bold privateers would steal up to a British vessel in their small whaleboats, surprise the crew and make off with the ship.

If there were valuable stores aboard, they would head into Greenwich ports to unload.

The final defeat of the British at Yorktown signified the birth of a free America, but the glory of the occasion was dimmed by the abject poverty of many border towns such as Greenwich. Homesteads had been burned, crops destroyed, cattle driven off, money stolen. But, despite all, Greenwich slowly began the difficult task of taking up again the threads of a previous existence. Gradually, trade with New York resumed pre-war proportions; new homes and farms grew out of the debris; life began to return to its former pattern.

With a view, not to shirking their just burden, but rather with the hope of lightening the burden of reconstruction, a town meeting in 1783 adopted a memorial which was addressed to the General Assembly, indicating the "losses and damages occasioned by the enemy" and also "damages occasioned by this being a garrison town, and the inhabitants harassed and distressed by both parties." In response to this petition in which the town asked to be relieved of the burden of taxation which would ordinarily fall to it, the General Assembly granted Greenwich an exemption from all taxes for the year 1783. In addition to this, the state government assumed the responsibility of reimbursing individual citizens for some of the damage to property suffered during the war. The funds for these payments were drawn from the sale of a part of Connecticut's famous "Western Reserve."

Greenwich at this time showed a lively interest in the formation of the Federal Government. The Constitutional Convention, which met in Philadelphia to lay the foundation stone of the American system of government, was the occasion for a special town meeting in Greenwich on November 12, 1787. Dr. Amos Mead and Colonel Jabez Fitch were chosen as delegates to the Hartford convention, called for the following January to ratify or disapprove the new Constitution of the United States. The envoys were instructed to approve "the doings of the Federal Convention lately held at Philadelphia." The first President of the Republic, which they had helped to set up, traveled through Greenwich on October 16, 1789, and halted his journey at the Second Congregational Church to gaze out over the farms which made a checkerboard at his feet toward the blue water of Long Island Sound. Later he wrote in his diary: "The superb landscape which is to be seen from the meeting house is a rich regalia."

The turn of the century found Greenwich a thriving, self-sufficient farming community, little affected by the external political clamorings of Alexander Hamilton and Thomas Jefferson. It was not until the liberal outcries of the American Toleration Party that the town was shaken from its apathy. Oliver Wolcott, running on the Toleration ticket, was elected Governor of Connecticut in 1817, and proceeded to rock the conservative foundations of the state with his many progressive and far-reaching political reforms. On the 4th of July, 1818, Clark Sanford and Enos Lockwood were selected as the delegates to a convention in Hartford to form a constitution of civil government for the citizens of the state. Later in the year, another special town meeting was called to ratify the liberal document which those delegates had drawn up.

The most significant of the reforms of Governor Wolcott and the Toleration Party, from a Greenwich standpoint, was the separation of civil and ecclesiastical power. But although 1818 marks the year of the legal divorcement, the bonds of over a century and a half could not be so quickly severed. Prominence within the ranks of the church remained a requisite to civil authority in the town. A wave of Puritanism swept over Greenwich in the 1830's and at one point the women of the community met in an historic session to expel from church membership the last male member of the Church Society.

The War of 1812 did not repeat in Greenwich the tragedy of the American Revolution. British vessels for the greater part of 1813 held control of the Sound; vessels appeared off Greenwich ports, amid the clanging of bells and the explosion of cannon, but not a single casualty was reported in the town and no damage was done to property. There is no record of a single special town meeting called during the course of the struggle.

After forty years of existence as a nation, America began to wake up and stretch. The call of the West, the hope of fortune struck deep at the heart of the Northeast. New England towns were reduced sixteen per cent in population in the two decades after 1830. The neighboring town of Stamford suffered a net loss of 194 residents in a ten-year period as her citizens pulled up their stakes. But Greenwich, standing practically alone, somehow resisted the lure. The town, indeed, increased its population by 124 persons at that time.

Attempts at industrialization were also doomed to failure. Colonel Thomas Mead invested heavily in a carriage factory on Mechanic Street. His factory was up-to-date, his employees efficient but after a short period of very moderate success, the venture fell to pieces. The enterprises that did succeed were situated close to Stamford or the New York border, where immigrant labor was drawn from neighboring towns.

Into this self-contained farming community the railroad made its appearance on December 27, 1848. The steamboat, which had been the chief means of transportation between Greenwich and New York for over twenty-five years, was slowly forced to yield to the new type of competition just as the sailboat had yielded earlier in the century. The toll State Road, which dated from 1792, grossed less and less until it was finally abandoned by the Connecticut Turnpike Company in 1854. The town, a farming community since its establishment, gradually developed into a suburb of New York City.

Previous to the official opening of the railroad line from New York to Boston, Greenwich had illustrated its apathetic attitude toward change by its steadfast refusal to cooperate with the railroad. Officials of the road sought permission to make Greenwich a halfway stop and this would have meant much to the town in a commercial way, since trains would stop-over for refueling and refreshment. But such a stop required considerably more land than the usual amount allotted to a station. The company would have purchased such property at a fair price, but the town not only refused to lower its real estate rates to attract the line, but raised them to the limit. The railroad passed through Greenwich, and Stamford got the halfway station.

Despite the town's official attitude, the 27th of December, 1848, was a gala day, for all of Greenwich turned out to witness the initial run of the new locomotive. The train, consisting of the locomotive and tender and one passenger car, "one of the most splendid description now in use on any road in the country," had to stand idle for three hours at the bridge in Cos Cob while the last rails were fastened in place. Skepticism ran high that day, as bets were placed as to whether the bridge would be able to bear the weight of the train. But finally, "the train moved majestically along and the next minute the western shore received its ponderous weight, and the welkin rang with the shouts of the congregated people." It was not until the following month that the roadbed was completed all the way into New York. Two years later the line was double-tracked, and a handful of commuters began to make their daily appearance in an empty baggage car, which became the first club car. The "iron horse" had brought Greenwich within one hour and twenty minutes of 32nd Street, which was a forty-five minute journey by carriage to Wall Street. This marked the first step in the transformation of Greenwich into a suburb of metropolitan New York.

The arrival of the railroad was accompanied by the later success of many business ventures which had previously been doomed to failure. Jared Mead had opened his "White House" on Rocky Neck in 1838, but it failed as a summer hotel because of the difficulty of securing supplies. But when Thaddeus Silleck took over the "White House" in 1855, the railroad had solved those difficulties, and the renamed "Silleck House" was a great success.

Captain William Lyon, a retired skipper who returned to his home town to spend the last years of his life, provided the impetus for the shift from town to borough government, which occurred in 1854. From his home on the site of the present Pickwick Theatre on Putnam Avenue the Captain used to spend many of his idle moments gazing out toward the Sound. But the beauty of the panorama which lay before him was marred by the sight of cattle and other farm animals which strayed here and there across the path of his vision. With three close friends, Jacob Weed, Augustus Lyon and Solomon Gansy, the Captain had Julius B. Curtis, one of the town's most successful young lawyers, draw up a bill providing for a borough system of government. The document was presented to and passed by the General Assembly.

✓ The charter allotted to the newly created borough the right to attend to numerous local duties such as the laying out and maintenance of highways and streets, fire protection, providing a watch, burying the dead, providing public lights, and many other purely local tasks. Under the new system, gradual progress was made toward improving the streets of the town as well as in the lighting system and the financial organization of the town.

The boundaries of the new borough extended roughly from Glenville Road on the north to Put's Hill on the east, south to the north line of the Havemeyer School grounds and west to Colonel Thomas Mead's hill and "Dearfields." As this area grew in population, its borders were gradually extended. The first borough meeting was held on July 10, 1854, and resulted in the election of Captain Lyon as warden and Robert Williams Mead as clerk. Julius Curtis, Philander Button, Lewis Howe, Postmaster Samuel Close, Alvan Mead and J. D. Steel were selected as the first Board of Burgesses.

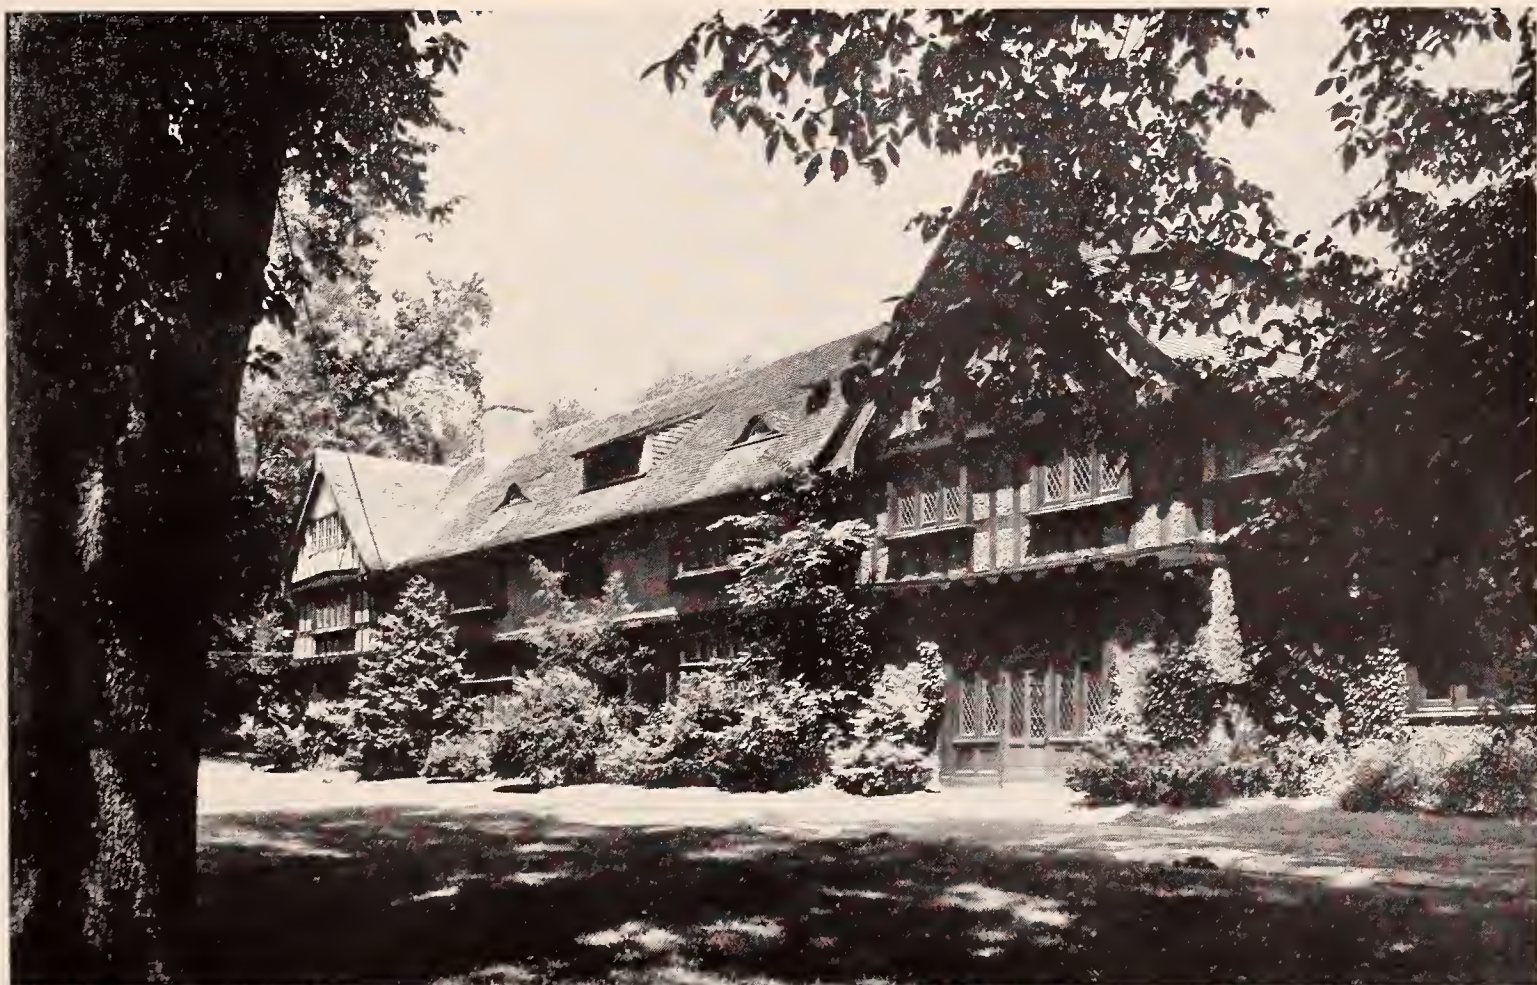

Even as late as 1850, Greenwich Avenue was little more than an unimportant side street; ruts dug deep into its dirt surface which became such a bog on rainy days that pedestrians were forced to climb the wall which ran the length of the street and walk in the fields on the other side. The improvement of the avenue can be attributed to the efforts of Henry M. Benedict, a youthful commuter who had recently settled in Greenwich. Mr. Benedict was in the habit of sitting on his porch until the train could be seen on the bridge at Cos Cob. He would then race his team of horses down Greenwich Avenue to the station just in time to jump aboard. But, on wet, muddy days, he had so much trouble with the ruts on Greenwich Avenue that he often was late. To remedy the lamentable state of the street, Mr. Benedict first appealed to the selectmen of the town, who staunchly refused to make the desired improvements. The young man then took the case to the County Court. In 1854 the anticipated improvement was made, and the name of the street was changed to Greenwich Avenue. From that time on it came into prominence as a business district.

Following the precedent of the Revolutionary War the embittered struggle between Northern "Abolitionists" and Southern slaveowners in the middle of the nineteenth century split Greenwich again into two hostile camps, "a house divided against itself." The older districts of Old Greenwich and Cos Cob were largely Democratic and "copper-head," whereas the borough was solidly Republican. Feeling between the two factions ran high and reached a peak at the time of the election of Abraham Lincoln. Speeches, parades and demonstrations of all sorts assumed near riot proportions.

After the actual declaration of hostilities, the bitterness abated somewhat, but there were periodic surges of hostilities throughout the course of the struggle. One Union supporter in Old Greenwich, Cornelius Ford, used to hoist the Stars and Stripes to the top of a pole at the corner of Shore Road and Tomac Avenue at every Union victory. Time and again the flag was ripped from its mast, and the owner was finally forced to stand guard with shotgun to insure the flag's safety.

On the 25th of September, 1862, the First Company of the Tenth Connecticut Volunteers marched off to war after a brief service at the Second Congregational Church. At the steps of the church, the Rev. Joel H. Linsley gave a sword into the hands of the brilliant young leader, Daniel Merritt Mead. The following year Daniel Mead was borne home on a stretcher, burning with typhoid fever.

With all her eligible young men enrolled in the Tenth Volunteers, Greenwich had a difficult time meeting her military quota. A bounty of one hundred dollars was offered as an enticement for enlistment. When nation-wide conscription replaced the old system of voluntary enlistments, the town granted a bonus of three hundred dollars to anyone who was conscripted. To aid the drafted men to find substitutes, the town voted a special fund which was used to purchase the services of persons, usually from jails or reformatories, to take the places of the drafted men. The continuous bounties which were offered took a heavy toll of the town treasury; in 1877 the deficit had sky-rocketed to $188,000.

News of the assassination of President Lincoln was received with deep sorrow in Greenwich by Republicans and Democrats alike. The Saturday that the sad news was received, the Rev. William H. H. Murray and a small group of helpers spent the greater part of the night draping the interior of the Congregational Church in heavy mourning. The following day the twenty-four-year old pastor delivered a sermon which is startling in the truth of its prophecy: "His name will not be forgotten. The living of today will tell it to the unborn and they, in turn, will repeat it to the remotest age . . . We cannot measure him today. Years must pass before his influence on his age can be estimated. It needs the contrast of history to reveal his greatness."

Greenwich struggled through the poverty of a post-war depression to the heights of prosperity which later followed. The residential and summer development possibilities of the town came into prominence in the ensuing years and attracted the attention of countless promoters. In 1865 Jeremiah Atwater, a real estate operator in New York, saw the latent possibilities in that section of the town which is known today as Riverside. A struggle over a postoffice followed, but the difficulty was finally solved in a satisfactory manner, and Riverside officially came into existence. Even the setback of the depression of 1873 failed to check the growth of this newest residential development.

No history of the town of Greenwich, no matter how brief, would be complete without at least a reference to William Marey Tweed. The notorious Boss Tweed, who was for eight years a resident of Greenwich, apparently reserved his plundering practices for New York, for he remained utterly detached from local politics. Three yachting friends of the Boss first carried the news to him of the beauty of the harbor. Finally he made the trip out to Greenwich on the train to behold for himself the beauties of the place. So charmed was he with the town that he called on Oliver Mead and secured his permission to camp on Round Island. Often thereafter the Tweed party could be found swimming or fishing off the Island, or visiting the saloons across the harbor in Rocky Neck.

Under Tweed's auspices, the lavish Americus Club was constructed in 1861 on the site on which Commodore E. C. Benedict later built his mansion, "Chimney Corners." To facilitate the sending and receiving of messages from his New York offices, the Boss sponsored the town's first telegraph office; the short-lived excursion steamer, John Romer, was another of the Tweed innovations. In 1865 he purchased an eighty-acre estate on East Putnam Avenue, now a part of the Milbank estate, for $18,000 and did extensive remodeling of the house and barn.

The scandal which tumbled the Tweed empire in New York City in 1873 brought the collapse of his Greenwich interests as well. The Americus Club, which had expanded its quarters in 1870, passed out of existence with the political death of its patron-saint. Tweed's last visit to the town which had captured his fancy occurred immediately after his escape from the New York jail. The fugitive rode a freight train to Greenwich, where he passed the night at the home of his favorite niece before setting sail for Cuba.

The land boom which reached Greenwich in 1870 marked a definite trend away from a farming community. Old, established families fought to maintain control of the farms which had been passed on from generation to generation, but they were not strong enough to combat the shift from a rural toward a suburban community. In 1875 the town purchased a building on Greenwich Avenue midway between what is now Lewis Street and Putnam Avenue, from Aaron Ferris to be used as a town hall to replace the old structure which had burned the previous year.

The Amogerone Fire Company was organized in 1879 to meet the increased danger from fire occasioned by the growth of the business district on Greenwich Avenue, but the town had to wait until 1896 before a police force was established. Previous to that date, a single night watchman had been hired by the merchants on Greenwich Avenue to protect their shops, with their heavily shuttered windows, from marauders.

Modern improvements slowly began to find their way into the town. The limit of one bucket of water a day per store was removed in 1880 when the Greenwich Water Company inaugurated its public service. The Southern New England Telephone Company first listed Greenwich as one of its exchanges in 1883. The telephone first appeared at the Lenox House and the company maintained a small switchboard in a back room now used as an office by the Boswell Drug Company of Greenwich Avenue.

Although the Greenwich Gas & Electric Company opened a steam electric lighting plant in 1886, there were no electric street lights. Edward H. Johnson, president of the Edison Electric Light Company of New York and a resident of Greenwich, who had a private plant at his North Street home, reported to the town meeting in the spring of 1888 that he could supply the Borough of Greenwich with electric street lights at an annual cost of $1,200. The offer was termed extravagant and was refused. The old method of lighting the streets by oil lamps was continued until 1890. The Johnson residence was the first in the town to be lighted electrically; many a passer-by was alarmed at the blaze which shone forth each evening from its windows. By the time a special borough meeting was held in Ray's Hall at the corner of Greenwich Avenue and Lewis Street on December 5, 1889, the value of the Edison invention could no longer be denied. Electric lights were voted for the town, and the contract was awarded to the Greenwich Gas & Electric Company. Because of the huge cost and rock construction difficulties, the town did not acquire gas service until July 3, 1926, when the Greenwich Gas Company inaugurated service in Old Greenwich. The service now covers all areas except the sparsely settled country sections.

The government of the borough was revised in 1881 to give more power to "lay out highways, streets and public walks." Public consciousness was slowly aroused and resulted in the establishment of the Improvement Association. It was at this time that Lewis and Mason Streets made their appearance.

The first edition of the Greenwich Observer reached the streets on November 15, 1877. The journal, which later merged with the Graphic, was the first successful and lasting venture into the realm of journalism in the town. It was thenceforth published every Thursday by the Keeler Brothers. Actually little space was devoted to the reporting of local happenings.

The invention of the automobile introduced Greenwich to its first speed limit, established in 1901 to restrain the new vehicles to twelve miles per hour within the city limits; Belle Haven, which had come into existence as a residential park in 1883, restricted the speed of all vehicles but bicycles to six miles per hour. Soon the "horseless buggies" chased the hitching posts from Greenwich Avenue, and an occasional garage appeared where blacksmith shops had formerly stood.

Amid pomp and pageantry, the first street car made its way up Greenwich Avenue on September 14, 1901, carrying free of charge for the day all who wished to try out the innovation. The forebodings of many citizens who feared that the street car would hamper the residential development of the town, were ill-advised. However, as the business section grew, the trolley car went out of style and was replaced by the bus in 1927. Four years later merchants clamored for the removal of the unsightly tracks, and this was finally accomplished along with the widening of the avenue.

The present town hall, which was dedicated on October 19, 1905, was the gift of Robert M. Bruce and his sister, Miss Sarah E. Bruce. It was through the generosity of Robert Bruce that the town, four years later, received a tract of land of about one hundred acres and buildings, to be used as a public park. As a testimonial to the public-spiritedness of the late Robert Bruce, the development was named Bruce Memorial Park.

Over a long period of years, the school system of Greenwich had grown unwieldy. Twenty different districts, with a profound lack of centralization, was the result in 1910, at which time steps were taken to reorganize the system. A central school committee and a superintendent of schools were appointed, and the foundation of the present system was laid. Gradually the elimination of school houses in the outlying districts was accomplished, and the pupils were transported to schools in the more important centers of population.

The fateful year, 1917, rolled around and once again Greenwich answered the call of her country. The boom years in the decade following the Armistice ushered in the greatest era of prosperity which the town had ever known.

During these ten years the population increased by fifty per cent. The attention of real estate promoters turned not only to the shore developments but to the back country where vast areas had been freed for estates by the collapse of agriculture.

The years brought with them radical changes in the constitution of the government of the town. In 1909 the Board of Estimate and Taxation was instituted to control the town's finances. The old borough government, called into being in 1854, was discontinued in 1932. Residents of other sections of the town had been receiving identical benefits with the citizens of the borough, but had been free from the evils of double taxation. Accordingly, a consolidation of the borough and town was effected. The year 1933 marked the passing of one of the oldest and most firmly established of all New England organs of government, the full town meeting. With over 15,000 eligible voters and no hall capable of holding more than a very small part of the number, the step from full to representative town meeting was made necessary.

The long-awaited Merritt Parkway was thrown open to holiday crowds on July 4, 1938. And thus, the growth of Greenwich has gone on. From the tiny settlement of Daniel Patrick and Robert Feaks it has become the finest residential community in the United States. Greenwich may well look back with interest on its three hundred years of history.
